Reflection of the week: Week 01

What did I learn this week?

This week, I learned about the internship process, required tasks, evidence collection, report preparation, and applying teaching methods and linguistics theories in real classroom settings. I also gained practical experience teaching a First Year co-educational class of 50+ students through reading comprehension, vocabulary, parts of speech, and contextual activities. Through the First Year English textbook chapter â€œQuaid on 11th August, 1947â€, I conducted reading and explanation, word meanings, phrases and idioms, synonyms and antonyms, MCQs, short questions, pair work, and whole-class checking, with approximately 85% of students showing good understanding. These activities reflected Vygotskyâ€™s Sociocultural Theory, as students learned through social interaction and collaboration during pair work, and the learner-centred approach, as students worked with examples and participated in activities rather than only receiving explanations. I also taught the eight parts of speech through the Dawn story â€œThe Word Warâ€ using separate charts and sticky notes through a boys-versus-girls activity, in which students identified two examples of each part of speech from the story. This lesson reflected Task-Based Language Teaching (TBLT), as students completed the task of identifying two examples of each part of speech from the story, with the outcome of correctly classifying the examples. Approximately 90% of students identified the parts of speech correctly. Overall, these experiences helped me understand the value of contextual and activity-based teaching in improving studentsâ€™ participation and understanding.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will focus more on studentsâ€™ individual participation and speaking practice. I will give students more opportunities to come to the dais, express their ideas, and use newly learned vocabulary and language concepts in their own sentences. I will also include more short activities that students complete independently, rather than only identifying answers. Along with this, I will pay more attention to students who hesitate or need extra support and give them additional practice.

Reflection of the week: Week 02

What did I learn this week?

This week, I worked on word formation, self-introduction, lexical relations, homophones, and homonyms with a First Year co-educational class. I taught â€œWord Formationâ€ by giving students an overview of affixes, prefixes, suffixes, roots, and base words on the board. I guided students to break words into prefix + base + suffix and conducted activities in which they formed two words using prefixes and two words using suffixes. I also provided charts for word-breakdown practice. These activities reflected Scaffolding Theory, as I initially explained the concepts and demonstrated examples, then gradually reduced my guidance so students could break down and form words independently. Approximately 85% of students were able to understand the word-formation concepts and complete the activities correctly.Then, I introduced the main components of self-introduction as a student, including greeting, name, class/grade, school/college, interests or hobbies, future goal or aim, and closing. I provided a worksheet with blanks for students to complete their information and guided them to organize it into a paragraph. After the written practice, I invited students randomly to the dais to introduce themselves in front of the class. This activity reflected Communicative Language Teaching (CLT), as students practised organizing and expressing personal information through speaking.Next, I introduced lexical relations, focusing on homophony and homonymy. Students identified homophones and homonyms, completed sentences by selecting the correct words, and participated in a boys-versus-girls competition. These activities reflected Task-Based Language Teaching (TBLT), as students completed exercises to identify homophones and homonyms and select the correct words to complete sentences. Approximately 90% of students showed good understanding of these concepts.As a result, these activities helped me understand the importance of written preparation, speaking practice, contextual examples, and active student participation.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will improve the clarity and organization of my instructions before starting each activity. I will use short and clear examples when introducing punctuation and multilingualism and check studentsâ€™ understanding before moving to the next task. I will also manage activity time more effectively and give students enough time to think, respond, and correct their own mistakes. This will help me make the lessons more organized and focused on studentsâ€™ actual understanding.

Reflection of the week: Week 03

What did I learn this week?

This week, I worked on Punctuation, Capitalization, and Presentational speaking skills with young learners, creating opportunities for them to apply language through practical classroom activities. I began by using an interactive story about a grandmother and a girl to introduce the importance of punctuation. Moreover, the sentence â€œLetâ€™s eat grandmaâ€ helped me demonstrate how the absence of punctuation can alter the intended meaning of a sentence. Before formally introducing the topic, students worked in pairs to punctuate given sentences. This pair-work activity reflected Vygotskyâ€™s Sociocultural Theory, as students learned through collaboration and interaction with their peers. Then, I explained the full stop, question mark, exclamation mark, comma, colon, and semicolon, along with the role of capitalization in written communication. Students rewrote a paragraph by inserting appropriate punctuation marks and corrected sentences containing punctuation errors. Approximately 85% of students were able to understand and apply the punctuation marks correctly in the activities.Furthermore, I also attended an internship class where Ms. Bakhtawar provided guidance about the online portfolio submission, progress review, remarks, and areas requiring improvement, while I clarified internship-related queries. Later, I conducted â€œPROMPT SPARKâ€,in which students selected speaking prompts from chits, prepared their responses within a limited time, and presented their ideas at the dais. The activity encouraged students to generate ideas, organize their thoughts, and communicate them clearly without lengthy preparation. This activity reflected Communicative Language Teaching (CLT), as students organized and expressed their ideas orally to develop their speaking and communication skills.Through these experiences, I learned that meaningful contexts, guided practice, preparation time, and opportunities for independent expression can help students improve their written accuracy and presentation skills. I also recognized the importance of giving clear instructions, managing preparation time, and designing activities that encourage students to apply their learning rather than simply recall information.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will focus on strengthening studentsâ€™ presentational skills by providing more opportunities for them to organize their ideas and present them clearly. I will guide students on how to structure their content, speak with confidence, and maintain clarity while presenting. Moreover, I will also provide brief preparation time and constructive feedback so that students can identify and improve areas of their performance. As a result, this will help me make classroom activities more focused on studentsâ€™ confidence, organization, clarity, and effective presentation.

Reflection of the week: Week 04

What did I learn this week?

This week, I learned how to teach presentational skills and guide students in preparing and delivering effective presentations. I explained the key components of a presentation, including content planning, audience awareness, organizing information into an introduction, body, and conclusion, using visual aids, effective delivery, eye contact, time management, managing nervousness, and handling questions. I also explained how icebreakers can capture the audience's attention and how speakers can respond to spontaneous questions. To provide practical experience, I assigned three presentation topics: Corruption in Pakistan: Causes and Effects, Artificial Intelligence: Pros and Cons, and The Effects of Copy Culture on Education. In the following class, students presented on these topics and applied the presentation framework taught in the previous lesson. They used icebreakers, organized their content, and responded to spontaneous questions. This activity reflected Communicative Language Teaching (CLT), as students practised expressing their ideas clearly and communicating effectively with an audience. It also followed a learner-centered approach because students actively participated in the learning process by preparing and delivering their own presentations.Furthermore, I also conducted an interactive question-and-answer session to encourage students to share ideas, think critically, and participate actively. Students asked multiple questions, making the session engaging. This questioning and discussion technique supported Vygotskyâ€™s Sociocultural Theory, as students developed their understanding through interaction and the exchange of ideas. Approximately 90% of students understood and applied the presentation skills effectively. After the presentations, I provided constructive feedback on areas for improvement and conducted an MCQs activity as an assessment technique to assess and reinforce studentsâ€™ understanding of presentation skills. This activity helped me identify areas where students needed further improvement.This experience improved my teaching, classroom interaction, and assessment skills. I also attended the internship class, where Maâ€™am explained the internship report and e-portfolio requirements and submission deadline. Overall, this week helped me connect presentation theory with practical teaching.

What can I do differently next week?

Next week, I will focus on teaching business letter writing, explaining its format, essential components, and the use of formal language through examples and practical activities. I will also conduct a test covering the topics taught throughout my internship, including parts of speech, word formation, self-introduction, homonyms and homophones, punctuation and capitalization, and presentational skills.

After reviewing studentsâ€™ answers, I will identify areas of difficulty and provide feedback to improve their understanding. This will help me evaluate studentsâ€™ progress and strengthen my teaching and assessment skills.

Reflection of the week: Week 05

What did I learn this week?

This week, I learned how to teach narration and letter writing through clear explanations, examples, and interactive classroom activities. I taught students the rules of direct and indirect speech, focusing on assertive and declarative sentences. I encouraged students to identify examples, explain the rules in their own words, and practise changing sentences from direct speech into indirect speech and vice versa. This reflected the deductive approach, as I explained grammatical rules and then guided students through practice activities. These activities helped students understand sentence transformation and apply grammatical rules more accurately. Approximately 90% of students understood and correctly applied the rules of narration.

Furthermore, I taught formal and informal letter writing, explaining their differences in purpose, tone, language, structure, and audience. I introduced the components of a business letter, including the sender's address, date, inside address, subject line, body, complimentary closing, signature, and name. I showed students sample letters and conducted a practical activity in which they wrote an inquiry letter about office supplies. This activity reflected Task-Based Language Teaching (TBLT) because students used their knowledge to complete a meaningful writing task. It helped them understand how to organize information and use appropriate language for professional communication. Approximately 85% of students understood the differences between formal and informal letters and applied the correct format in their writing activity.

During the final review, I asked students questions about all the topics I had taught throughout my internship. They responded well and demonstrated a good understanding of the topics. The questioning and discussion technique helped me check their understanding and encouraged them to recall what they had learned. In the previous week's presentations, approximately 90% of students understood and effectively applied presentation skills. These experiences helped me recognize the importance of practical activities, student participation, clear explanations, and regular questioning in improving students' learning.

I also attended the internship class, where Maâ€™am Bakhtwar clarified our questions and provided deadlines for submitting the internship log and reflective log. Overall, these five weeks of internship helped me develop my teaching, communication, lesson planning, classroom management, and assessment skills. Through teaching reading, grammar, punctuation, speaking, narration, and letter writing, I learned to use clear explanations, practical activities, and regular questioning to support studentsâ€™ learning. The experience helped me connect educational theories with classroom practice, understand studentsâ€™ learning needs, and build confidence as a future language educator. With the completion of all teaching activities and the final review, my internship came to an end.
